Halloween is celebrated on 31st October every year. It has its origins in the ancient Irish and Scottish Samhain festival - the festival of the dead. The Celts believed that on this day, the dead came back to mix with the living. They dressed up in spooky costumes and lit bonfires to scare away evil spirits. Centuries later, the Catholic Church named 1st November as All Saints Day to honour those who had gone to heaven. Today, some traditions from its early beginnings still remain, such as dressing up in scary costumes.

Reading Comprehension

HALLOWEEN

Halloween is celebrated annually on 31st October. Although today it has been commercialised to dress-ups, trick-or-treating and pumpkin carving, it had a much darker beginning.

Halloween originated from Samhain, the ancient 'festival of the dead' celebrated in Ireland and Scotland. To mark the end of Summer and the start of the New Year (which the Celts observed as 1st November), pagans would dress up in costumes and light bonfires to keep themselves safe from ghosts and evil spirits. They believed that on this night, the dead and living mixed. Poor children went from door to door promising to pray for household's dead relatives in exchange for food. Samhain is still celebrated today by some, but is different to modern day Halloween celebrations.

Centuries later, the Catholic church declared 1st November as All Saints Day. On this day, people honoured those who have gone to heaven. Festivities incorporated some of the traditions from Samhain.
